

Hadrian's wall was abandoned as the last line of defense, when it became Roman policy to attempt the reoccupation of southern Scotland and to build a new bulwark, the ANTONINE WALL, on the FORTH-CLYDE line. When that project was abandoned 163AD, Hadrian's wall became once more the northern frontier and it remained so until Roman

came to an end in 1910